Essay topic: Genre hybridity in the modern Western

This paper examines a quartet of American Westerns released within the last few years. It argues that twenty-first century Westerns are increasingly hybrid entities, using the conventions and tropes of other popular film genres to bolster their appeal to contemporary audiences. After a brief overview of the history of the genre, the films True Grit (2010), Cowboys and Aliens (2011), The Lone Ranger (2013), and Django Unchained (2012) are discussed as examples of hybridity in the Western today.

The American Western was, in the first half of the twentieth century, one of the most popular of film genres. The most famous work of early cinema, The Great Train Robbery (1903), was a Western and is credited with establishing films as a commercial entertainment medium. It was famous for its rapid shifts of location, including action on a moving train. Although there had earlier been short films which depicted the Wild West or paid homage to it, The Great Train Robbery was the birth of the genre. While the genre was consistently popular, by the late 1930s Westerns were widely regarded as a 'pulp' genre in Hollywood, but their prestige was dramatically revived in 1939 by several major studio productions including Dodge City (with Errol Flynn), Jesse James (with Tyrone Power in the lead role), Union Pacific (with Joel McCrea), Destry Rides Again (with James Stewart in his first Western, alongside Marlene Dietrich) and perhaps most famously, the release of John Ford's landmark Western film Stagecoach, which became one of the biggest commercial
